The aim of this study was to determine the prevalence and risk factors of chronic non-communicable diseases and their psychological impact in Turkish older adults. One thousand five hundred and fifty seven participants were recruited between the ages of 60 and 92 years through community centres. An exploratory cross-sectional design was used in this study. A questionnaire was completed for each participant, including demographics, disease status, physical activity and quality of life. Assessment tools included the Geriatric Depression Scale, the General Health Questionnaire, the Mini-Mental State Examination, the Physical Activity Scale for the Elderly, the University of Rhode Island Change Score and the Activities-specific Balance Confidence. Age, gender, marriage, education, employment and social support were significant predictors of all outcome variables in multiple regression analysis. Women and participants with lower social support and university education were more vulnerable to health problems. Participants with chronic diseases had lower quality of life, and those with arthritis had poorer balance confidence. The findings of this study suggest the importance of providing health education programs for older adults. Health professionals need to be aware of the quality of life of older adults. It is also important to integrate active lifestyle promotion into the health education programs of ba244e880a
