They don't really involve any sort of "whataboutism", of course, since the real whataboutism I'm going to show was perpetrated by the Left, not the Right. First, we have the suggestion by the National Review that Democrats have been and should be labeled "treasonous" for daring to do anything that is at all similar to what President Obama is trying to do. Now, I'm not going to bother to point out that Obama is, of course, a Democrat. But I am going to point out that, in general, the Republican Party is deeply complicit in the Obama agenda, whether they are "feeling the Bern" or not. In this instance, the National Review considers it right and proper to call out Democrats as "treasonous" for doing anything they can to prevent President Obama from accomplishing anything. Now, they do say that this is being done in order to "provoke" Democrats, since they are so eager to see any Republican (especially Obama) as the enemy. But it seems pretty clear to me that they have a much more concrete reason: if they can get away with calling out Democrats as "treasonous", then they can claim a) they aren't part of the conspiracy, or b) they are somehow going to "save America". If they can do that, then they can basically claim the same two things that the Right has been doing for the last several years. So I'm actually rather pleased at the opportunity to demonstrate this. Let's take the issue of gun control, because it's fairly illustrative. The way that National Review makes their point is fairly obvious: Obama wants to push through some sort of gun control legislation, so Republicans have every reason to oppose him. If they do so, it's called "treason". That's very convenient. In reality, Obama has no real intention of doing anything with the law that is passed. (He
