A significant number of computer users forget the tool and enable their browsers to use the "accept-encoding" header in the HTTP request to signal the media browser to make a forward-looking request, thereby minimizing the resource consumption. However, there are cases when this approach does not quite work, especially when serving media content over several sub-resources on the same page. You see, the "accept-encoding" header will only work on the initial request but not on subsequent requests. What should you do in such cases? The answer lies in a trick we call "cookie cherry-picking". From now on, we will explain to you how you can read the "accept-encoding" header and what you should do with it to allow the requested resource to handle more resources than it actually requires. Cookie cherry-picking with WebSockets To read the "accept-encoding" header, you need to enable the WebSocket feature in the media browser. To do this, the application should load the main WebSocket resource, which declares the URI of the sub-resource that will carry media data. It should also make sure that its contents has no other sub-resources within the page, so that the media browser's "accept-encoding" header will be used. Finally, the application sets the 6a5afdab4c
