AS THE SUICIDE rates skyrocket, the news media are abuzz with reports of depressed children who experienced a bereavement or divorce. But death doesn't just hit kids. Old people, too, fall victim to suicide, at unprecedented rates. In America, more than 45,000 people kill themselves every year. Worldwide, the number is in the millions. In the past, suicide rates among the elderly were substantially lower than those among the young. But that is no longer the case, and by many measures suicide is now the leading cause of death among elderly Americans. "If you look at the suicide rate among elderly people in America, it has tripled since 1960," says David Meltzer, a researcher at Georgetown University. Women make up the majority of suicides; men are four times more likely to commit suicide than women. There are many factors that may lead to death by suicide. It has long been known that the combination of depression and substance abuse, particularly alcohol abuse, is a particularly lethal combination. And the rise in antidepressant use has been linked to an increase in suicide. The numbers here, too, are enormous. One study found that half of depressed older people were on an antidepressant. So are a lot of the elderly who take their own lives. Certainly a basic knowledge of depression and a willingness to talk about it can help. However, not everyone who comes to believe they have depression simply takes the plunge. A third of older Americans with depression don't kill themselves. Yet, studies have shown that nearly all elderly suicides were preceded by some depression. Some researchers have suggested that suicide may be a state of mind more than a state of body. The thoughts of the depressed old people who kill themselves are often less anguished than those of those who commit suicide later in life. Although older people may have the personal means to commit suicide, as a group they are simply less likely to express their suicidal thoughts, not because of lack of desire but because of their social situation. One study found that the probability of suicide for older persons is inversely correlated with degree of social integration. Condemning suicide and reducing the stigma of depression do much to help, but perhaps the greatest help in the end is simply knowing someone who has killed himself or suffered a depression and survived to talk about it. Not all elderly suicides are tragic or telltale. Suicide occurs for a variety of reasons. Some are caused by diseases, some by terminal illnesses, some by substance abuse, some by longstanding illnesses. But for
