Show more Christmas tree-shaped earphones have been a topic of conversation for years—but now they're coming back to the forefront. Why? Because of the new "HoloLens" technology that will arrive at Microsoft stores around the holidays (along with Windows 10). Take a look at this video to see exactly what we mean. It shows the earphones, connected to a PC, using HoloLens to overlay virtual instructions and movement, making it seem like the user is actually interacting with the environment. That's exciting for consumers. It's even more exciting for developers. The Specs Here's the takeaway: HoloLens is a set of sensors that projects holograms into 3D space. It looks like an Oculus Rift, but it's really a lot more complex. In the video, the earphones connect to a PC running Windows 10. HoloLens-enabled earphones will need the Windows 10 Fall Creators update. The Windows 10 Fall Creators update also contains some other major features, including a new set of tools for creating apps for Windows Holographic. You'll be able to create holographic experiences in HoloLens, like you would in any other app, that sense their environment. HoloLens' creators designed it to be a display that you wear—like a pair of glasses. A user could, for example, play a card game while standing in front of a still holographic image of a wine bottle. The game would even know the bottle was real, showing information and manipulating the game based on how the user interacted with the bottle. Microsoft's own HoloLens website describes the device this way: HoloLens is a holographic computer. Wear it and you can see, hear and interact with holograms in your environment. You can summon digital creatures, build a virtual model, and play a game with friends. Make, view and interact with holograms all around you. Why Now? As a refresher, HoloLens was announced at the Build conference in February. It's being developed by the company formerly known as Microsoft Research. HoloLens has been shown at a few conferences and expos, but this is the first time we can imagine consumers seeing it in stores. The biggest reason for that is that HoloLens requires a powerful PC to run. The developers who attended Build showed off some of the intricate, immersive applications that could be created with HoloLens. Getting
