This wikia is dead, donno why of many potential energy sources under development at the state, national and global level. In some prospective applications for hydrogen fuel cells, electrolyzer hydrogen is a convenient source of hydrogen fuel for the fuel cells and is not stored in tanks and then brought to the site of the fuel cell. As used herein, the term electrolyzer hydrogen is used in the broadest sense to include essentially pure hydrogen, hydrogen containing small quantities of impurities such as carbon dioxide, hydrogen sulfide, helium and the like. Electrolyzer hydrogen for fuel cells is typically produced by an electrolyzer which processes a source of water, generally the body or seas of salt water, to produce hydrogen and oxygen. Water-peroxide fuel cells are also known, and the water produced as a by-product of the water-peroxide fuel cell is used as the source of water for the electrolyzer hydrogen. Hydrogen is typically produced by an electrochemical cell which separates oxygen from the water and combines hydrogen with the oxygen to produce water and hydrogen gas, and in the event that electrolyzer hydrogen is to be the source of hydrogen for the fuel cell, then, the hydrogen gas produced is combined with the oxygen produced by the same fuel cell and they are transported to the fuel cell. In the past, in using electrolyzer hydrogen as a fuel for fuel cells it was necessary to handle the hydrogen gas at low pressures and at temperatures close to the zero-point of hydrogen. This required that the hydrogen gas be compressed to some predetermined pressure and further that the hydrogen gas be cooled to a minimum temperature before it was delivered to the fuel cell. Typical operating pressures for electrolyzer hydrogen are between 3 to 10 atmospheres. In the past, in order to achieve the desired low pressures and temperatures, hydrogen gas was fed to an electrolyzer at the flow rates and pressures which a fuel cell subsequently consumed. In the foregoing process the electrolyzer hydrogen was typically passed at very low flow rates to the fuel cell
