Credit: Danilo Beccari/Museum für Naturkunde. No one knows why koalas are getting rounder. But scientists have now found a gene that could be responsible for the changes. Koalas have an unusual brain that makes them hard to locate, but it's the extra layer of brain tissue that is changing its shape to accommodate for the brain enlargement that is the most interesting. Koalas spend up to three quarters of their lives in trees - up to 20 hours a day eating eucalyptus leaves, and have been known to gain weight by eating just two. The koala's unusual brain is only about the size of a grapefruit, and contains more nerve cells than a human brain contains, but they're difficult to study. Researchers at Australia's University of Adelaide have an answer. Koalas have a gene that controls brain development - a gene that makes certain types of stem cells in the developing brain become neurons. The genetic make-up of koalas is the same as humans, but the pattern of gene activity is different, compared to people. The study from the university's Nedbank-SA Institute for Cell Dynamics found that the koala gene that controls the production of neurons also controls the development of the brain. Koalas, which are marsupials, have a different pattern of gene activity compared to humans. Credit: Wikimedia They're trying to study the gene in humans - and also to see if it is linked to the shape of human brains, which differ from person to person. "What we're trying to identify is what's doing the changes, whether it is hormones, or whether it is just the genes, so we're really starting to look at the genes. We're trying to identify which genetic variants are important to the development of the koala brain," said Queensland University of Technology's Joe Kocher.
