The media are having a field day documenting the enduring cultural appeal of the Bush presidency. The TV news cameras are embedded at Saturday night football games, where they capture mini-frenzy over the enlivening antics of one quarterback or another. They monitor the tailgates where beer flows freely. And, of course, they capture the football itself. This is such a popular sport that a network, Fox Sports, devoted much airtime to the day's college bowl games and assembled some of its best-known commentators at the same college, the University of Oklahoma. In true TV fashion, one commentator – Jon Voight
