A 100,000-ton iceberg is about to break off the northern coast of Greenland. NOAA has declared a “State of Disruption” for the ice and alerted ships to prepare for possible flooding. The ominous “State of Disruption” sent an unprecedented surge of icebergs into the Greenland sea after a huge rift opened in the land’s center. So far, it’s only caused a surge in melting glaciers, but satellite imagery and ground data show that the crack could soon cause a 100,000-ton iceberg to detach from the GISP2 ice shelf and smash into the coast. If that happens, there will be a large body of seawater that will flow through the fissure and into a bay that will be named after the mega-berg. NOAA’s predictions come as the November sea ice extent is now at record highs. In a July statement, an iceologist named Jennifer Francis has warned that many global warming deniers have fallen for a misinformation campaign orchestrated by climate skeptics that it’s a lie to blame the antarctic for global warming. Per usual, when we talk about climate change, we also have to factor out the obvious hatred of our species and the fact that humans are the only species on the planet that systematically destroy ecosystems for profit. If you want to blame humans, get on with it, and stop being angry at us.

Optimizing image-guided surgery: a case of neurovascular imaging for radiosurgery. Neurovascular imaging, including the use of angiography, may be helpful for the management of vascular malformations and vascular tumors. The combination of magnetic resonance (MR) angiography and MR imaging may provide complementary image information that may not be available from either modality alone. In addition, there is an emerging body of evidence to suggest that during stereotactic radiosurgery, radiation from outside the target volume can contribute to untoward effects. We report a case of a patient with a deep-seated, low-grade glioma who required repeated biopsies and resections over a 3-year period. The majority of the tissue obtained during surgery was benign but the tumor was not completely removed at several recurrences. Despite successful removal of the tumor at later surgical revisions, a subgroup of patients who harbor a residual tumor following their initial surgery may benefit from a radiosurgical boost. The aim of this report is to demonstrate the usefulness of image-guided surgery (IGS) in creating therapeutic synergies between radiosurgery and microsurgery. In addition to imaging-guided biopsies, IGS may be used to expand the cone of biopsy in certain patients. We illustrate the use of IGS in the management of a patient with a symptomatic patient with a low-grade glioma for whom the majority of surgical biopsies were benign but the tumor was not completely removed. In the subsequent evaluation following stereotactic radiosurgery, the patient had a repeat biopsy that was confirmed to be malignant and was eventually completely resected. This article suggests that IGS can be used to increase the likelihood of complete resection of tumor for a subpopulation of patients. It's not about ignorance. I know the Labor Party has a lot of rules, a lot of regulations, and they're not too bad on the whole. But once in a while, you get the government that just doesn't care. Don't get me wrong, the Labor Party has been around for more than 100 years, in my lifetime. The Liberal Party has been around even longer - it's been in existence since the time of... the... Nick Minchin has a piece at The Australian today about the activities of the organisation known as the Australian Liberty Alliance.
