Many professionals swear by the program, and it's an industry standard. But many other professionals write off Photoshop and its other programs as being too complicated for their needs. Although they may be right in certain cases, I think that if you use the appropriate programs for the job, Photoshop, Photoshop Elements, or similar programs work just fine. The following sections demonstrate how to use Photoshop's basic tools to turn a simple black-and-white illustration into a colorful picture. Adjustment Layers A feature unique to Photoshop, and to many other editing programs, is the Adjustment Layer. With this tool, you can create Adjustment Layers, which overlay your image, modify a selected area of your image, or combine several settings to affect the entire image. To make an Adjustment Layer, follow these steps: 1. Choose Layer⇒New Adjustment Layer⇒Radial Gradient, as shown in Figure 8-1. The Radial Gradient tool is a commonly used tool in graphics applications, and it creates colored gradients. When you use the Radial Gradient tool to create an Adjustment Layer, you're actually creating a gradient with several different colors, such as red, green, or purple, along the gradient. 2. After you create the Radial Gradient Adjustment Layer, click OK to open the New Layer dialog box. 3. Add a name for this adjustment layer (such as Hue) in the Name box. 4. Change the layer's opacity to 0%, Summary It is well known that living organisms experience up to a 50% decline in hydrated mass following dehydration. This dehydration-induced decrease in hydration is associated with, and appears to be the result of, a variety of metabolic changes. The purpose of this project was to determine whether or not the decrease in intracellular fluid volume following dehydration was associated with a decrease in both Na-K ATPase (Na-K ATPase) activity and blood volume in dogs. This study was performed on the dog because this species is easily dehydrated. Using an extracellular marker (sodium (^{23}Na)) to monitor blood volume and Na-K ATPase activity in tissue samples taken from skeletal muscle, it was determined that after 48 hours of dehydration there was a decrease in blood volume and Na-K ATPase activity in tissue samples taken from skeletal muscle. These findings demonstrate that the dehydration-induced decrease in blood volume and Na-K ATPase activity is associated with a decrease in intracellular fluid volume in a variety of organs.

One of the most important single activities in any workplace is to prevent employees from working from home. Research shows that the productivity of work-from-home employees is half that of their office-bound coworkers. Workers who do not have strict home office policies lose productivity that could be earned by an employee who works from home. Here are the top 10 ways to give employees an unhealthy alternative to working from home:

1. Not requiring conference rooms A study published by the University of California-Berkeley found that conference rooms are not used at all. Four out of five employees do not use conference rooms at all.
2. Not providing employees with telephones The number one productivity killer is smartphone usage. A worker who has a smartphone can get a lot of work done instead of spending time in a conference room.
3. Not having a dedicated workspace A dedicated workspace is important. When work that could easily be done from the work area requires phone calls or e-mails, the worker is forced to leave the work area, go to the common area and interrupt productivity.
4. Not creating a second workspace for the assistant The benefits of a second workspace for an assistant are limited to the time the assistant is not with the primary worker. Once they enter the work area, the second workspace provides little or no productivity benefit.
5. Using the work area as a social space The work area should be used

Cathy was overwhelmed at first by the number of people who responded to her call for help. Many of them had formed groups of their own. "I don't think I would be able to do that myself," she said. It's hard, by now, to count the ways that breastfeeding moms are feeling like superhumans lately, not just physically but also emotionally. In front of a room of women, last week in the Shelton Building, a local pioneer with polio named Barbara shared her story, sitting alongside another breastfeeding mom, Cathy, who also had suffered from polio. The two met because of a connection to the Barbara and Bethune Hospital where she received treatment for the birth of her son, Justin in 2014. They are trying to gain the rest of the 50,000 members needed to form a statewide breastfeeding advocacy group. Cathy is president and Barbara is
