How to Edit Text in Photoshop After you create an image, you may want to add text to it to help identify what it is. Photoshop provides the basic tools for adding text, including fonts, and you can also add design text. Design text is a fancy way of saying that you can insert text into an image that is not even part of the actual photograph. The text can even be much smaller than the size of the face, so it is easy to spot. With text added to the image, you can add a lot of detail and what this article will show is how to make text look as if it is part of the image. The way to add the text is to click and drag to create a text box. This will create a white square in which the text will be added. If you want to add text in the center of an image, use the text tool and press and hold Ctrl (command) while you create the text box. This will center the text on your image. The text tool allows you to create a text box using the Insert Tab. To add the text, go to Text on the Edit Tab, and click and drag in the text box. The font family and size can be selected from the drop-down menu that is found at the bottom-right corner of the window. To resize a text, hold

When an answer increases the score of a question, or changes its score to something other than zero, why is that done differently from when the question is answered? Specifically, when the question is answered (upvoted, accepted, or voted by others), it is changed to have the maximum number of points, for the history of the question. When the question has a score other than zero, I see the following: When the question has a non-zero score, a tally of all of the actions that have taken place on the question including the author's action is displayed in the right sidebar. When the question is touched, or edited, the tally also displays the author's action, marked as 'old'. I am not exactly sure what is the difference in how the question is changed to have the maximum number of points, when a user answers the question or edits the question, and how it is changed to the current score, when the author touches or edits it. I assume that it has to do with the fact that the user is editing the last change to the question, versus the edits that are all part of the history, but I am not sure.
